

I recently watched an episode of 'Fear Factor' because it featured a local couple. What I saw was far more offensive than anything else I have ever seen on television. Certainly there should be standards of decency, but in your proceedings I think you should weigh whether eating all mannner of filth is in fact more offensive than a brief exposure of a breast (not to say that this is acceptable). Certainly there should be standards of decency for a medium that is accessible to children. However I am most concerned with shows that degrade their participants with disgusting stunts that are potentially harmful to the participants. (Even though they have no doubt signed releases I don't think you would allow a suicide to be broadcast just because a release has been signed.) I would urge the commission to exercise more control over these type of 'shock' or 'reality' shows.
